HUMANITIES

Preparing for a career in Humanities

The humanities - also referred to as social sciences - are part of the liberal arts. The emphasis is on languages, literature, art, music, philosophy, and religion. In humanities, you'll study all aspects of society - from past events and achievements to human behavior and relationships among groups. You learn how to learn, developing your skills in researching, reading, writing, and thinking your way through abstract problems.

Your humanities degree should match your own range of personal characteristics and interests. Excellent written and oral communication skills are necessary. Since your career could involve constantly seeking new information about people, things, and ideas, intellectual curiosity and creativity are important personal traits. Open-mindedness and adaptability are important in all kinds of humanities disciplines, where the central tenet of study is that humans are incapable of ever being objective, and all research must reflect that.
